the idea of having such a law. Most of the States arc in favour of such a legislation though they have expressed apprehensions about possible misuse of various provisions of the Bill under consideration, including violation of human rights. The National Human Rights Commission (NHRC) has opined that there was no need to enact such a law.

The Government would take into account the views/comments of the State Governments as well as the NHRC. which arc now available, and so modify the Bill that it harmonizes, to the extent possible, the safeguards for civil liberties with security imperatives. The Government would also hold consultations with political parties, other interest groups, etc. before taking a final view in the matter.
